more evenly: a repository of files and a database of records that refer to the various files. The ledger uses blockchain technology with a hash of each transaction in an easily accessible database, allowing anyone to look up the history of a transaction through the online ledger. Each step of the process – from producer to consumer – is tracked and verified by the entire community of contributors. Everyone contributes to the process of creating, verifying, and distributing content, so the entire community benefits from the quality of the process. The process works similarly to how music files were distributed through Napster, in that it allows anyone to look at the content but to access and listen to it requires separate payment or payment plans. The Bitcoin ledger, however, is updated every time a file is downloaded, and the decentralized network is updated every time a file is added. This is much different than Napster, where people would be able to download the same file a number of times and still receive a small payment for each download. A complete ledger is run on a decentralized network, and every transaction is immutable. If one person makes a mistake, everyone can see it. It is like the special case of Bitcoin that not only is there a single currency but also a single internet of money. The developers behind Peer to Peer electronic cash think there's a huge value in a ledger that not only stores the data about the transaction and the original file, but also that of subsequent creators of copies. They call it a "Proof of creation". The proof, at the end of the process, is the network of accumulated blockchains. The blockchains that store the data surrounding a given transaction are said to be "committed", making it easy for anyone to review the process to find out who created the file and when. There's no central records keeper so everyone can see the ledger at a given time, but in a decentralized system there is no single point of compromise. Peer to Peer electronic cash is a technology being developed by a number of groups, but most recently the Bitcoin Development group (see more below for more on bitcoin development). Communities and peer to peer electronic cash The blockchains are held by a distributed network of nodes. Each node has a copy of the blockchain, but a separate copy. The nodes are held together 3ef4e8ef8d
