between Cu, Zn and Pb distribution in the earthworm species Eisenia foetida (Savigny, 1826) and Lumbricus rubellus (L.) 1758. The earthworms of the genus Eisenia play a key role in the retention and transfer of elements through the soil environment. The objective of this study was to determine the distribution and concentrations of Cu, Zn and Pb in Eisenia and Lumbricus species in soil, with the aim of relating these factors to each other and to evaluate the effects of an agricultural practice on earthworm distribution. The results obtained for Cu showed low variability in concentration, while the element Zn presented greater variability. Pb concentrations were higher for E. foetida than L. rubellus. For both earthworms, a positive correlation
