Defragmentation of the drive: Files and folders are divided into groups of files that are stored in one place on the hard drive. The groups are called clusters.

When the number of clusters exceeds what the hard drive can hold, files are fragmented, and the system must search for the files when it wants to read or write one. This can affect the performance of the operating system. A defragmentation program divides the files into smaller parts so that they can be stored in fewer clusters and searches for the files in the fragments. A defragmentation program makes copies of files, moves them to a specific location on the hard drive, or both. Defragmentation generally is not required, and the program is installed with Windows by default, but many Windows users disable it by default and do not know about the impact that defragmentation can have on the system.
