NFL street defense has been featured in quite a few movies and television shows over the years. But how much of a difference can you expect from real NFL defenses to the rules of other football games? The answer is, sometimes a lot! Here are some comparisons between street football and NFL rules. One of the biggest differences in football is that NFL rules are less forgiving. A defender can make a tackle on a receiver as he is in the act of catching the ball (which would be a foul in street football). But if the defender makes the tackle on the receiver after the ball is caught, it is now considered an illegal blindside hit and it can be called an Unnecessary Roughness. Many of the football rules are meant to protect the players, and they get in the way when playing street football. Defensive players can be as physically aggressive as they want without the fear of punishment from the referee. NFL rules restrict the way defenders can play and this often leads to blocking to block instead of tackling to tackle. NFL players play in teams and their activities aren't restricted to the ball carrier. If the ball carrier goes out of bounds, the defensive team can advance the ball 5 yards. In street football, defenders can attempt to tackle the ball carrier but must put both feet in bounds. In football, the ball is in play for 1 minute after every play. On street football, games go until one team gets tired and allows the other to score. The biggest difference is that in football, you play offense and defense at the same time. In street football, it is more of a "play offense, play defense" game. On the field, street football rules are often easier to understand and sometimes result in shorter games than NFL football. If one team scores, it is over. But in NFL games, the clock doesn't count down until the ball is snapped. It's up to the referees to stop play after every score.
